BEER

Belgium
The tradition of small breweries, many of them in Trappist monasteries, makes the blue beverage one of the most interesting in the world. In Belgium is the home of the famous "Bouquet" beer. The cities of Brussels and Antwerp are known for their many small breweries.

Canada
Canada boasts North America's oldest continuously operating brewery - Molson & Co. The Monarch is the oldest in the country, founded in 1845.

China
Most of the Chinese beer is exported to the U.S. It is one of the cheaper imported brews, being dry and often with a "hoppy" character.

South of the Border
Mexico has some of the oldest breweries in the world, with some dating back over 400 years.

Czechoslovakia
Czechoslovakia has a long history of brewing, with breweries dating back over 100 years. The country is known for its crystal clear, somewhat bitter Pilsner-style beers.

Down Under
Australia has many of its own craft breweries, producing unique and diverse beers.

England
England has a long tradition of brewing, with many famous breweries such as Bass, Fuller's, and Wells.

France and Italy
France and Italy are known for their craft brewing, which dates back to the 18th century. Many of the beers are similar to those in England and are enjoyed by beer enthusiasts.

Germany
Without a doubt the beer center of the world, German beers are known for their quality and character.

Holland
Netherlands is one of the most important beer-producing countries in the world. The city of Amsterdam is known for its many small breweries.

Ireland
Ireland has a long history of brewing, with many famous breweries such as Guinness.

Japan
Japan has a long tradition of brewing, with many famous breweries such as Sapporo.

Kenya
Kenya is known for its many small breweries, which date back to the 19th century.

Philippines
The Philippines is known for its many small breweries, which date back to the 18th century.

Scandanavia
Offering a wide variety of brewing styles, Scandinavian beers range from light lagers to dark stouts.

South of the Border
South America has many small breweries, producing unique and diverse beers.

United States
The United States has a long tradition of brewing, with many famous breweries such as Anchor and Samuel Adams.

DRAUGHTY TERMS

ALE A
Brewed by the older, top-fermented process, ale is produced and aged at higher temperatures than lager (bottom-fermented) types. Its characteristic malt flavor, full palate and vinous qualities result from the use of top-fermenting yeast. Ale is darker and more highly hopped than most lagers.

BEER
A fermented beverage made from malted cereal grain such as barley, wheat, rice and others, in addition to hops, yeast and water. Generally conceded to be the eighth wonder of the world.

BOCK B
This heavy, usually dark beer tastes slightly sweet and malty with a strong flavor of hops. Traditionally brewed in the winter for spring consumption, bock takes its name from the German city of Einbeck, where it was first brewed. Labels almost invariably include the figure of a billy goat — “bock” in German.

DOPPLEBOCK DB
The strongest, darkest beer of Germany, it is thick and rich with a long-lasting head. Brand names of dopplebock almost always end with the suffix “-ator.”

LAGER
A generic term for bottom-fermented beer. “lager” is derived from the German word for store, or age. It is produced and aged at a temperature of close to freezing, much colder than beers of the top-fermented process. The worldwide popularity of lager is due to its clarity and smoothness.

DARK LAGER DL
Originating in Munich, this full-bodied beer tastes sweet, malty and slightly hoppy. It is generally more aromatic and creamier in texture than a light lager.

LIGHT LAGER LL
Characteristically pale gold in color and light-bodied, these lagers are fairly high in carbonation with a slight hop flavor and mellow dryness.

LIGHT BEER LB
For our purposes, and those of many brewers, the term “light beer” is used to designate one of lower calorie content.

MALT LIQUOR ML
In general, this brew in the bottom-fermented style, tastes maltier than typical lagers and contains a higher percentage of alcohol than other types.

PILSNER P
Hailing from Pilsen, Bohemia (now known as Czechoslovakia), this lager-style beer in its true form has a slightly tannic character, with an emphasis on hops. Aged in wood, it glows with golden color and is traditionally the palest of all lagers.

PORTER PR
Originally brewed in England to satisfy the demand for a 50/50 mix of ale and stout, porter’s dark brown hue comes from roasting the barley before the brewing process begins. It possesses a less pronounced hop flavor than ale, and is a heavier brew than most, with just a hint of sweetness.

STOUT S
Similar to porter, but less sweet, stout is a dark, heavy, top-fermented beer with a rich, malty flavor and bitter hops taste. It is low to medium in carbonation and traditionally served at cellar temperature.

WEISS (WHEAT) BEER W
This German brewing style substitutes wheat for barley, in a process that lends it a distinctive, yeasty aroma. Generally light in hops and heavy in carbonation, wheat beer’s creamy appearance and texture are topped by a rich, foamy head.
